Not illustrated. 1793 Excerpt: . . . as vain and doubtful tokens of capacity and learning; while, more jealous to be learned than to appear so, he disdained to take the honorary degrees. His mind had infinite pleasure in the study of the mathematics, and his heart found ever)-wish happily gratified in the amiable society of Mr. Weigel. That gentleman had a design of composing a course of morality, to be handled after the manner of the geometers. The esteem he had for Puffendorff induced him to communicate his scheme to him; and our philosopher entered so well into the principles of morality, that Mr. Weigel thought him more fitted than himself to execute it. Accordingly he gave him his manuscript, and permitted him to make what use of it he judged proper. Every thing attached our author to his professor; the lessons he received from him, the sweetness of his conversation, and his assiduous politeness. But he was afraid of abating his favours by remaining any longer in his house; he had already been there a year, which was too long, in his opinion, for a man incapable of acknowledging the services he had done him: he left him, therefore, and returned to Leipzig. When he was uncertain there how to proceed in order to lay the foundation of a moderate fortune, he received a letter from his brother, who was in the service of the king of Sweden, advising him not to lose his time in his own country, but to seek to...
