Church, Dover, Del., Sept; 25, 1881 The following in either direction may be with alacrity by some, but languidly by others, until the two parties gradually approach and are only separated by a faintly discernable line. Still there are only two great parties, the righteous and the wicked. Now there are many occasions in human history and many events in which the two parties, with all their varying hues and all their shades of differences, are united in a common object, a common interest, a common struggle, a common sorrow. And so we find it now. The worst men in our nation, in common with the best, are struck dumb with horror at the appalling crime which robbed us of our late President, and are overwhelmed with the same grief, wearing the same tokens of sorrow, using the same epithets of regret or of indignation, expressing the same sympathy and condolence and moved by the same spontaneous impulses. What we find among ourselves, we see only with less intensity among all the civilized peoples of the globe. Notably so in Great Britain, but appreciably so in all other enlightened nations. How can we account for it? On this ground: God hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation. In a word, the nations of mankind, despite race, language, institutions and religion, are one humanity, influenced by like motives, moved by...
