Dept. of Housing and Urban Development, Office of Policy Development and Research, 2006 OCLC Number: (OCoLC)191913159 Subject: House construction -- Technological innovations. Excerpt: . . . differentiation, and profits ) and business fragmentation. Fragmentation includes several dimensions: geography ( manifesting in different regulations and codes and or information sharing ), horizontal organization ( resulting in possible problems in communications between builders and in turnover rates ), and vertical organization ( from independence rather than interdependence within the process, information sharing, and the protection of intellectual property associated with a new product ). In addition, they pointed out that homebuilding is a complex process that includes multiple participants with different but often interrelated motives that impact innovation. The broad categories that Koebel et al. ( 2003 ) identified as possible determinants of adoption and diffusion serve as a useful organization of the literature pertinent to residential production builders. The categories are Organizational Structure, Organizational Culture and Decision Process, Human Resources, Market Context, Industry Characteristics ( including communication channels and social networks, particularly between suppliers and venders ), Technical Attributes...
